OUILTING

Quilting, sometimes called pourpointing, is the art of stitching together two or more layers of fabric with padding to provide insulation and protection. Usually back or running stitches are used.

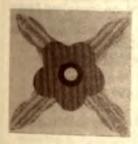

The ancient Chinese made padded clothing out of layers of stitched together fabric. This technique was ideal protection against the cold. Quilting became popular in England in the late 17th century and early 18th centuries. Petticoats, jackets, waistcoats and coverlets were decoratively quilted. America's quilting is distinctively different because of its "patchwork."

American patchwork was born out of adversity and necessity. For many years, new yard goods were too expensive and in very short supply. In response to this situation, women used old scraps of fabric and bits of worn out clothing to create what was called a "Crazy Quilt." This unique quilt features no pattern and was limited only by imagination.

Gradually, quilters developed favorite patterns from this method. Quilting became a way to demonstrate one's skill and artistry and also a form of social gathering.

Patchwork quilts usually were produced in two separate steps: first the patchwork top was made by one person, then came the quilting "bee." In this communal effort, several women gathered about a frame and sewed top, padding, and backing together while greatly enjoying each others company. Young girls were introduced to the art at the "bee" and they were expected to have at least a dozen tops completed by the time they reached courting age.

Quilts also marked important occasions in a family's life; bridal quilts displayed hearts or lover's knots within the pattern; mourning quilts included bits of the departed's clothing, and a friendship quilt was worked on by several women, each including her favorite pattern block and signature.
